Preventive healthcare and maintenance of work ability

Statutory occupational health services provide preventive health measures for your employees. The purpose is to prevent work-related illnesses and accidents, as well as to promote health and safety in the workplace. Occupational health services include work accommodation, rehabilitation, assessment of the work environment through workplace visits, and health monitoring through medical examinations carried out at 3–5-year intervals. Occupational health services are carried out by medical and occupational hygiene experts who support employers and employees in creating a healthy work environment. Workplace visits, health examinations, and the preparation of action plans form the foundation of this collaboration.

Occupational medical care

Occupational medical care is a part of occupational health services that focuses on diagnosing, treating, and preventing work-related illnesses and conditions. Services within occupational medical care include consultations with occupational physicians, occupational health nurses, physiotherapists, and psychologists, and can range from brief consultations to extended treatments and rehabilitation. The goal is to support employees in managing work-related health issues and to facilitate a timely return to work. Through early intervention and support, occupational healthcare helps reduce absenteeism and promotes long-term work ability.
